Goals of any business: Increase sales, improve profits, and create a quality product or service. But before the company can achieve the ultimate objective, every business must first develop a vision statement. A vision statement is a critical element in the business plan. Without one, the likelihood of a company's mission being accomplished is slim. A vision statement is the guiding force behind the business. Vision statements are unique to each individual business. Typically, vision statements are about a one year or longer timeframe. In spite of this, they must be planned for and guided by a company's current goals. Without a vision statement, a company may lose sight of its ultimate goal: to maximize profits. In order to do so, a company has to maintain a clear picture of its future. A vision statement provides that needed foundation. It helps the company maintain focus on its ultimate goal by demonstrating its vision for the future. To be effective, a vision statement has to include the following points: a description of the company what it hopes to accomplish with its plans an assessment of the company's immediate surroundings a plan for reaching its vision in the future Considerations for writing a vision statement A vision statement should be written in a way that is succinct, clear, precise and understandable. It should summarize the company's objectives in a simple manner and address all four goals that are included in a business's plan. If a company isn't willing to share its vision statement, how do you know that it is worthy of your investment or support? Perhaps your best option would be to contact the company and request a copy.

Businesses often choose to share their vision statement with the public because they want to demonstrate that their company has a "face." A company is more likable when its primary purpose and goals are clearly defined. Therefore, a company that comes across as having an unfriendly or unappealing "face" is viewed as lesser in quality than a company that projects a friendly, trustworthy public image
